President Reagan is going to get a medal he will cherish. The award will come from the fellows of derring-do — the heroic members of America's original intelligence agency, the Office of Strategic Services. The presentation will take place May 29 at the Washington Hilton at this year's OSS reunion dinner. The award is named for Gen. William J. Donovan, the patriot and Medal of Honor-winner who founded our first secret intelligence service.

Donovan protégé Bill Casey, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, is honorary chairman of the dinner. Co-chairmen are Lt. Gen. Bill Quinn, Evangeline Bruce — one-time member of the OSS and widow of David Bruce, who figured prominently in it — and Owen McGivern of New York.

The citation for Mr. Reagan, who follows such previous winners as President Eisenhower, Lord Mountbatten, Bill Casey and Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, will read: "As the outstanding leader of the Free World in the courageous spirit of Gen. Donovan, Ronald Reagan has rendered the kind of service to the cause of freedom that characterized the general's career, especially in his continuing concern with the world's safety and our national security — the purposes set forth for the awarding of the medal — as well as being the president who has rebuilt American intelligence to its present high capability."
